History 101

SUBMITTED BY JIM COVENEY

Hastings' first dairy was a wooden structure built in the 1880s. It functioned as a cheese factory, with farmers bringing their milk in cans on wagons drawn by horses. This daily event was captured in a photo that has been used in Hastings Historical Society's recent calendars.

In 1928, it burned down. In 1929, G.A. Gillespie rebuilt a new red brick structure on the site and continued making cheese.

In 1938, Arthur Orr bought the factory and produced cheese till 1946. He then switched to processing bottled milk. He appointed a board of directors to organize getting a steady supply of local milk. They were William McFadden, Herbert Oliver, Fred Lynch and Willis Preston.

In 1953, Orr sold the Dairy to Percy Arthur who operated it until 1960. Andersons Dairy purchased it and soon closed it. At this point, the red brick structure was renovated into a home which is in use today. It is just outside the village boundary on County Road 45, on the way to Norwood.

In a recently found 1940 financial statement for Ormonde Dairy, it stated they processed 875 tons of milk and produced 92 tons of cheese, in that year. Keep an eye open for old Ormonde milk bottles as they are valuable and scarce collectables.

Canadian, Eh?!

In the early 1840's, a Peterborough Ontario farmer named David Fife was the object of ridicule from his neighbours because of experiments he had been conducting to create a strain of wheat suited to the cold Canadian climate. By 1843, he had come up with a new strain called Red Fife that ripened more quickly than other strains, and so was adaptable to the short Canadian growing season. It also made high-quality flour. Half a century later, Charles Saunders crossed Red Fife with an Indian strain called Hard Red Calcutta and created Marquis wheat. It was much more resistant to disease than Red Fife, produced more grains to the bushel, and was ready to harvest in just one hundred days. Marquis wheat was introduced in 1907. Within twelve year, 90% of Canadian wheat fields were growing Marquis.
